Recruiters listed based on ratings provided by ClearlyRated, Google, blog posts and personal recommendations
Use your network to identify additional recruiters in your field.
Recruiters and staffing firms work for the employers who pay them , not you. They can help you connect to potential jobs,
Recruiters are motivated by the need to fill their clients' open positions. Be professional and courteous, but persistent, if they don't get back to you.
Sometimes these firms will be your employer of record, and provide your paycheck and benefits on behalf of their client. Sometimes they are just external recruiters.
The individual recruiters listed may not be the best ones for you as some specialize in the types of jobs they handle; if they want to forward you to someone else, go with it.
All agencies work differently. Some want you to come in and complete an application; others prefer a short phone conversation. Expect differences and know that they do not determine the competency level of the agency.
Contact them weekly to let them know your status (you're still looking).
Be patient. You may not get a call with a job from a given recruiter for months; that's okay. It only takes one and different recruiters have access to different (and sometimes overlapping) areas of the job market.
If you get a job possibility from more than one agency, go with only one; do not get yourself submitted twice for the same position. While you don't need to identify agencies to other agencies, do pick one and let the other know your resume has already been submitted.
Many agencies coordinate with specific employers. If you have any target companies, find out what agencies they use and get listed with them.
